The complaint of the trooper was that the old man was drunk and had made some sarcastic remark to him while on his horse. He struck him with his riot stick, knocked him down on the street, and left him in a very bad condition. The justice made the old man pay the costs of the case and assessed no fine. This is only one of a dozen similar cases. Another case was called to my attention by the brother of the man arrested. He came here and made complaint to me that his brother, while on the way to the station with his mother to take a train to New York, was struck down by one of the troopers and thrown into prison. His brother is in prison yet, so far as I know. I don...
