Excerpt: .in poetry, unless the decoction prepared by Shakespeare s witches in the play of Macbeth be regarded as one. The only legitimate questions to be asked in the appointment of a judge are, Is he capable? Is he honest? Does he know the law and will he be governed by it? I do not know of any safe rule by which to select judges, except to select them from those members of the bar who have there already run successful careers, illustrated throughout by distinguished industry, probity, and ability. To appoint judges by any other rule is simply to make an experiment which would probably prove a failure. The present age is certainly in some respects, to a marked degree, an age of progress. The laws that control the forces of nature have been studied, and the practical knowledge thus acquired has been made to promote the convenience and subserve the necessities of man very largely in very many ways. The steam engine and the telegraph are some of the trophies that have rewarded those students who have wisely applied the knowledge obtained by a diligent study of the laws of nature. But I am afraid that it cannot be said that our modern civilization is intrenching the citizen and making him more secure in the enjoyment of his rights of person and property. I am afraid that it cannot be said with truth that there is progress in that direction. There certainly is...
