JWstJjaDir, bify iis ooblg Qs and s and tt. mr. Cushman! It was Mrs. Wickfords voice. Robert raised his head, which had been buried in his hands, and, brushing quickly from his eyes something very like tears, opened the door of his chamber. At the foot of the staircase you will find me, she continued. I would have sent this to your door, but the servants are at present engaged. Two gentlemen await you in the parlor, and upon this card you will find their names. Robert glanced hastily at the writing, and then turned away; but, a moment after, he replied to Mrs. Wickford, --Please say to these gentlemen that I will be with them in a moment, --though, between us, Id rather not see them, for by so doing I must sacrifice much enjoyment. I was far away from this cold city when you called me, and I really should like to have remained there the rest of the evening. He had been reading a letter from home; and, oh, how he had wept over it! His eyelids were damp, even after his return to his room, with the tears which he had shed. I do not know, he said, within himself, as he refolded the letter, pressed it to his lips, and placed it in the pocket of his coat, -- I do not know what has possessed me. I have become as chicken-hearted as a girl. If Uphams card...
